Tate commission for local photo book keeper

In response to the Tate Commission's call for a local photo book keeper, the National Museum of Photography, Film and Television (NMPFT) and the National Media Museum have announced the appointment of David Goldblatt as the first ever photo book keeper for the UK.

David Goldblatt is a photographer who has worked on projects that explore the history of photography in the UK and has been an influential figure in the field. He is known for his work on the photography of the British library, which he has been involved with since the late 1990s.

The role of the photo book keeper will be to identify and promote the work of contemporary photographers, as well as to work with local communities to develop new ways of sharing and understanding photography. The NMPFT and the National Media Museum hope that this initiative will help to raise awareness of the importance of photography in contemporary culture.

The NMPFT and the National Media Museum have also announced a new exhibition, 'A Book about Australian Women', which will run from September 2019 to March 2020. The exhibition will feature works by a range of female photographers, including Tracey Moffatt and Suzannah Clarke.

The exhibition is part of the NMPFT's ongoing commitment to promoting the work of female photographers, and follows the success of its previous exhibitions, which have included works by photographers such as Hannah Laycock and Emily St. John.

Make sure to visit the NMPFT and the National Media Museum to see these exciting new exhibitions, and to learn more about the work of contemporary photographers in the UK.
